Why do we Need Consulting Services?

Consulting defined as individuals or entities able to provide special expertise in one or more technical fields. These services may be of an advisory, supervisory, or implementation nature and are provided by skilled experts with specialized knowledge and experience.

The services rendered by consultants are normally for a finite period of time and well defined scopes of work described by clear terms of reference (TOR) and are generally of an intellectual nature.

They cover a wide range of diverse activities, which may entail but are by no means limited to feasibility studies, advisory services, construction supervision, policy studies, and strategy formulation preparation of key documents such as tender documents, training, quality control, financial and accounting services, environmental or social impact studies, economic and financial analyses, professional editing, and public information provision.

Such services are provided from a range of sources. Traditionally, consulting services have been offered by such entities as engineering firms, financial advisors, accountancy firms, law firms, and management consultants. In recent years, the field has expanded to include firms with almost all kinds of expertise and orientation, from information technology through agricultural services to environmental technology. All these types of firms have found a market for their particular type of expertise and have, to a greater or lesser extent, been able to develop sufficient levels of business, experience, and knowledge to offer their services to a wide variety of clients. They range in size and nature from major, established companies with several thousand employees, covering a wide breadth of disciplines, to small, boutique-type outfits with small numbers of staff having a highly specialized focus. In addition, a large number of individual experts have entered the market and have provided their services either directly or, at times, through particular consulting firms. Nongovernment organizations (NGOs), institutes, universities, and international agencies also provide consulting services from time to time.
